ABSTRACT

Indian literature is a resonant reflection of the country's different people and their stories. For many years, it has been woven from the threads of everyday lives, struggles, and victories. It is witness to the sturdiness of Indian people. A fresh perspective emerges with every new voice, enhancing the literary landscape. Earlier only Sanskrit literature was considered pan-Indian literature. Vernacular writings eventually found their way into Indian literature. Only ten years ago did tribal literature gain academic recognition as literature. Tribal stories that were previously only told orally have now been published in print, allowing them to transcend national boundaries. The translation industry has made it possible to break the barriers between languages. As a result, we have begun reading works of literature from far-flung regions of India. The significance of regional voices in Indian literature is examined in this paper, with particular attention paid to writers from tribal communities. Examining the writings of Mamang Dai (Adi), Jacinta Kerketta(Oraon), and TemsulaAo (Naga) highlights their contributions to the literary canon. The importance of regional voices in Indian literature is highlighted in this study, along with their capacity to dismantle barriers and foster intercommunal understanding.By critically examining their works, the authors contest prevailing narratives, advance social justice, and recover their cultural legacy. To further develop their voices, we can work toward a more impartial and varied literary landscape that respects the individuality of the human experience.

Keywords: Regional Voices, Tribal Writers, Indian Literature, Social Justice, Cultural Identity.

Introduction

Indian literature has the most learned scholarly writings in it, by giving importance to the select writers and communities. But at the same time they are underestimating and marginalizing the other writers in
